

THE STARS ARE WAITING: and other nature poems

In this work the poet opens for us a subjective window on the natural world in a modern American city. This is a world often hidden in the urban environment. He sees a stark contrast between the artificial constructs of the city and the beauty of the natural world. Far more than simply literal, this represents the conflict between the culturally induced thought-constructs which draw man away from his inner self, represented by the natural world. It is onto nature that man may project this inner environment and seek meaning and the Divine reflected. His work is a quest for this meaning and the ultimate Consciousness which animates all life.
