

The Iliad: Volume Three: Books Seventeen to Twenty Four

At the end of Book Sixteen, Patroklos is slain. How the Argives and Trojans upon his loss continue war and how Achilles avenges his friend upon Hector the poem relates. In Book Twenty Three the funeral games of Patroklos are conducted by Achilles. King Priam, in the final book, redeems the body of Hector from Achilles. There is an epilogue wherein there is at least one sonnet about each book of the Iliad. Lights translation impersonates Homeric Greek. It runs with Achilles and like man-shattering Hector in the shock of arms is resolutely sharp. As unrelenting as sublimity, not yielding lyrically, unprosaically vindicating Homers vision, the brightest labor Light has attempted and would bring it over as a consummate attempt. Homeric Greek is simply salubrious, soulfully celeritous, resuscitantly poetic, never prosaic. As Mozart sounds like Mozart in all his compositions, so Homer has a tone of voice specific to the vehemence of life. Lights translation, we believe, has this Homeric music quite unlike the unspritely softness of tenured professors. This book has the passion and devoutness of a striver in the open market. The professors have credentials, he must prove myself.
